Diverse geographical and climactic conditions result in unique cultivated landscapes for growing wine on estates each with their own charm. Depending upon climate and soil type, hanging position, and method of cultivation, characteristic vineyard landscapes created all over the world are an impressive testament to the fact that wine is as much nature's gift as the product of viticulture. It is common for wineries' storage and production facilities to be on-site, while their architecture contributes to shaping the scenery. On the following pages, you will find several distinct examples of the interplay between vineyard architecture and scenery-monumental building sculptures, such as at the Bodegas Ysios by Santiago Calatrava, or more subtle buildings, like the Stryker Sonoma Winery, that integrate harmoniously with the surrounding vineyards.
